Dear Ms. Shiratori, Mr. Benedek, Ms. Laxer, and Mr. Mattout,

I need to update and consolidate my prior correspondence.

Although I requested cancellation of order #1050840 before shipment, 7 For All Mankind shipped the item anyway. This directly contradicts the brand's own stated processing window of 2–4 days prior to shipping and makes clear that the decision to bypass my cancellation request was deliberate.

This is no longer a simple policy issue. It is a bad faith practice that risks drawing the same scrutiny Shein and Zara have faced for opaque or unfair treatment of consumers. Competitors (AG, True Religion, PAIGE, Citizens of Humanity, J Brand) all provide more flexibility, which makes 7FAM's refusal stand out even more.

At this point, the most efficient and reputationally safe resolution would be:

1. Refund the $268 in full, and
2. Allow me to keep the product as a one-time goodwill gesture — closing the matter immediately, at far less cost than prolonged escalation.

This outcome would fairly resolve my request, avoid unnecessary regulatory and media attention, and reflect positively on the brand's judgment.

If I do not receive confirmation within 24 hours, I will move forward with the escalation steps already outlined in my Final Notice and prepared press statement, including filings with the FTC/BBB, outreach to consumer advocacy groups, and sharing the story with fashion media outlets.

Sincerely,
Charles William Kinslow, IV
