
AB...$104.63?

3 messages

Kate Berry <kate.berry@arizent.com>
To: Chase Kinslow <chase.kinslow@gmail.com>

Wed, Aug 12, 2026 at 1:01 PM

Hi Chase - Are you trying to get just $104.63 back?
That's the loan amount? Can't be.
kate

Kate Berry
Reporter
American Banker
562-434-5432
310-503-6201 c
kate.berry@arizent.com

Chase Kinslow <chase.kinslow@gmail.com>
To: Kate Berry <kate.berry@arizent.com>

Wed, Aug 12, 2026 at 4:27 PM

That was the total for the fraudulent loan charge, but because it initially appeared as a $26.16 purchase, Affirm only attempted to correct that amount. I say attempt because they say in their CFPB reply that they couldn't process a refund, as I had made a payment with a Visa card and then initiated a chargeback with my bank.

None of that is true. The referenced card, a Visa ending in 3151, was a prior Affirm virtual card, and I notified them of this in advance. I obviously can't request a chargeback for a third-party, currently inactive virtual card, and either they were genuinely confused or being deliberately evasive.

The CFPB, the mechanics of which I don't clearly understand, simply stamped the complaint as resolved and closed it out. As to how a company as big as Affirm can't resolve a matter that simple in scope in a month, well, it's confounding. Especially when you're under a cease and desist, outside counsel has been retained, your account is supposedly frozen, and yet you're receiving not only emails from actual customer support reps, but emails about purchasing power increases.

Chase
[Quoted text hidden]

Chase Kinslow <chase.kinslow@gmail.com>
To: Kate Berry <kate.berry@arizent.com>

Wed, Aug 12, 2026 at 6:05 PM

It would be perfectly reasonable to view my account of events with a certain degree of skepticism. Over the past month, I have extensively researched BNPLs, fintech companies, CFPB issues, etc. I realized that BNPLs, in particular, use certain tactics to delay refund processing, create difficulties in resolving requests, and rely on arbitration agreements to ensure that no user issue ever reaches litigation.

I am not a crusader by any means, but my motive changed after realizing how systemic this issue is as well as its impact on account holders writ large. That is why I have been so adamant about getting the message out regarding this dispute. Because no matter how complex BNPLs and fintech companies try to appear, the techniques they use are easily detectable and discernible when you know what to look for. Regardless of the outcome of my case, I want to inform future users that there are some unconventional ways to bypass these established practices. Over time, I suspect the shameful nature of these business practices will eventually result in regulatory oversight with teeth.

Finally, I work at Walmart as a backroom stocker. I'll let you connect the dots, but academic credentials don't necessarily translate into competency or future success. Yet, after reading the complaint filed by the FTA against the CFPB regarding the Administrative Procedures Act, and the arguments set forth, even I could identify a complaint devoid from reality, factually incorrect, etc. But even so, the CFPB folded. So that is why I continue to pursue this issue, even as it extends to topics and industries not originally or directly associated with Affirm.

Chase

[Quoted text hidden]