Ms. Lee:

Thank you from the bottom of my heart for the current regulatory landscape engineered by your organization.

Without the Financial Technical Association's heart-warming work, I would have missed out on a four-plus week (and still active) roller-coaster ride with Affirm after my identity was stolen.

You see I didn't understand that something called a "BNPL" is granted status tantamount to diplomatic immunity here in the U S of A.

A brief summation of my experience: CFPB complaint filed...Affirm replies: 🙄....CFPB counters: 👍 ... ⚖️.

Your organization sued the CFPB in October 2024 to kill an interpretive rule that would have made BNPL providers do three very basic things: investigate fraud disputes, issue refunds, and tell consumers what they owe and why. You won. The rule is gone. And the arguments you used to get there don't hold up to five minutes of scrutiny.

The APA argument: You argued the CFPB couldn't classify BNPL accounts as credit cards through an interpretive rule without formal notice-and-comment. That's a fine argument in a vacuum, except that federal agencies issue interpretive rules every single day without notice-and-comment. That's the whole point of the exemption under 5 U.S.C. § 553(b)(A). The IRS does it with Revenue Rulings. The SEC does it with staff guidance. The FDA does it with warning letters. The CFPB itself had 67 pieces of active guidance on the books before this administration pulled them in May 2025. Nobody sued over any of those. But the second someone told your members they'd have to actually look at a fraud claim before denying it, suddenly the Administrative Procedure Act became the most important statute in America.

The reliance argument: You told a federal court your members "relied" on the CFPB's prior interpretation for over a decade. There was no prior interpretation. The CFPB never put out a single advisory opinion, no-action letter, or guidance document saying BNPL was exempt from Regulation Z. Not one. The agency just hadn't gotten around to it yet—probably because your industry barely existed before 2018. BNPL went from 16.8 million loans to 180 million in two years during COVID. You repackaged the CFPB not paying attention to you as the CFPB giving you permission, then called it a "reliance interest." That's not reliance. That's running a red light at 3 AM and arguing there was implied consent because no cop pulled you over.

The billing cycle argument: This one is my favorite. You argued Regulation Z was a "poor fit" because BNPL has "no billing cycle." Regulation Z defines a billing cycle as "the interval between the days or dates of regular periodic statements" where the intervals are "equal and no longer than a quarter of a year." 12 C.F.R. § 1026.2(a)(4). A pay-in-four loan has payments every 14 days. That's an equal interval. That's shorter than a quarter. It satisfies the definition on its face. And that's just pay-in-four—Affirm offers 6-, 12-, 24-, and 36-month installment loans with APRs up to 36% and monthly payment dates. Those are monthly billing cycles by any definition anyone has ever used. Meanwhile, every BNPL provider reports payment history to Equifax, Experian, and TransUnion on a monthly cycle. So you have a billing cycle when it's time to report a consumer to credit bureaus, but you don't have one when it's time to investigate their fraud claim. Neat trick.

The big picture: Add it all up and your organization's position is: we can't be regulated as credit cards because we're different. We can't be regulated under a new framework because you didn't use notice-and-comment. We can't be held to past standards because there weren't any. But please don't start a formal rulemaking where we'd actually have to explain how we're different, because that might end with consumer protections and we'd rather just not have any. And even if we tried, you simpletons couldn't possibly understand the mechanics of how we operate. Our comprehension is entirely reliant on Claude in IT, and with the increasing severity of his hallucinations, well HIPAA. We take that one seriously. Birthdates, driver's license numbers, social security numbers, bank account information? Not so much.

*Affirm—one of the companies your members' dues fund you to protect—denied my fraud claim in 86 minutes flat. No human reviewed it. Their managing counsel sent me a Cease & Desist for reporting the fraud, then threatened a countersuit three days later. Then Affirm filed a response with the CFPB claiming I'd initiated a "consumer bank chargeback" on the fraudulent loan. I hadn't. The payment was made with a previous Affirm virtual card—their own product. They told a federal regulator the payment came from my bank when they knew it came from a card they issued. The CFPB auto-closed the complaint based on those statements.

None of that would have been possible if your lawsuit hadn't killed the rule that required them to actually investigate before they denied, actually tell the truth when they responded, and actually treat a fraud report like something other than a nuisance.

The "substantial burden" you saved your members from was reading a police report before hitting deny. 🍌

Eternally grateful,

Chase Kinslow
